The Admiralty Islands are renowned for the large double-handled bowls which were made by the Matankor people of Lou Island, south-east of Manus (Buhler, 1935: 20). However, smaller ladles were also made in the same region. In this example the wood handle is gummed securely to the gourd bowl, and although elegant in its present form, it is likely that at one time there was a low openwork frieze of carving around the outer curve of the handle.
