This type of ornament is generally called 'kapkap', a term deriving from a New Ireland language which is now used widely by Europeans for Melanesian ornaments of this kind. They are usually worn as neck pendants on ceremonial occasions, but also function as valuables in local exchanges.

The white disc is ground from clam shell, while the filigree overlay is made from a thin piece of turtle shell. Both are pierced through the centre for suspension or attachment. Reichard (1933) illustrates a large selection of museum specimens.
