This is a late work by Ike Taiga (1723-1776) depicting a rustic hut situated beside a tree on a rocky slope. The title appears in the top-left corner of the painting, brushed in clerical script: 'Misty Rain in Valleys and Mountains' (Taniyama nuka'ame 霧雨の谷と山). The work is signed 'Painted by Kashō' (Kashō sha 画) and has three seals, which have not yet been deciphered. [1]

Taiga has used washes of sage green, pale grey and pink for the foliage of the trees, and pale blue to suggest fine rain. The scene is peaceful and idyllic, without becoming static. In fact, the composition is extremely dynamic. The stillness of the trees and hut is contrasted with the knotted formations of the churning landscape.

Rather than presenting the viewer with a depopulated landscape, Taiga has included two figures within the composition. They can be seen within the humble dwelling, framed by the window of the hermit's retreat. One figure appears to be bringing his companion refreshments on a small tray. The side of this building juts out of the rock to the right. The negative space around the hut could suggest that this rural dwelling is suspended above a valley shrouded in mist, or it may indicate the presence of a wide river or lake.

The eye follows the course of a river, which begins as a waterfall in the top right section of the painting, perhaps broadening in the middle section of the composition, and continuing its course toward the bottom right corner. The widening river or lake, possibly represented by the central blank unpainted area, divides the composition horizontally into two sections. Taiga has created a sense of spatial recession by using this device to delineate foreground from middle ground.

Taiga was a second-generation Nanga literatus, who worked as a professional artist. Departing from the 'scholar-amateur' ideal, Taiga lived by fulfilling commissions and selling his paintings and calligraphy. Taiga formed friendships with the Chinese painters affiliated with Ōbaku Zen, who practiced at Manpuku Temple in Kyoto, and also with monk-artists of the Rinzaï Zen sect. In addition to being influenced by Chinese paintings, Taiga's style incorporated Rinpa techniques, such as tarashikomi 'dripping in', which involved laying fresh ink on top of a still-wet ink ground to produce a blurred effect.
