This figure is not easily classifiable, though certain features suggest a northern Northwest Coast origin. Genitals were sometimes carved on male figures (Duff et al., 1967: no. 186; Wardwell, 1978: 90; Holm and Reid, 1975: no. 63), and the pointed head-dress could correspond to a shaman's goat-horn crown, indicating that this was perhaps a shaman's charm pendant. The two holes in the face may be nostrils, or even a representation of Inuit labrets. The armpits are cut square and the back is plain. The material resembles whale ivory rather than walrus tusk.
