

Pinched form

Bryan Newman

Not on display

Title/Description: Pinched form

Artist/Maker: Bryan Newman (Artist)

Accession Number: 50792

Historic Period: 20th century

Copyright: © Estate of the Artist

Credit Line: Accepted under the Cultural Gifts Scheme by HM Government from Leslie Birks Hay and allocated to SCVA, 2016

Here Bryan Newman uses the traditional and delicate hand-building technique of pinching (see also 50761). He has hollowed out a single piece of clay to create this strange and otherworldly vessel. The thinness of the pinched clay can be seen on the shard-like rim and protruding middle section. The earthy rust coloured surface and matt glaze give it the appearance of an archaeological artefact.

Bryan Newman studied and taught at Camberwell College of Art. His work is associated with the wider sculptural studio ceramic movement of the 1960s and the work of ceramicists including Dan Arbed, Ian Auld and Gordon Baldwin. However, unlike them, alongside his abstract and figurative sculptural works he made an extensive range of standardware at the Aller Pottery in Somerset, which he established in 1966 with his wife, Julia Newman.

Sim Panaser, July 2020

Further Reading

Tony Birks, Art of the Modern Potter, (London: Country Life Books, 1976)

Tony Birks, 'The Newmans at Aller', Ceramic Review, 43 (January/February 1977), 4-7
