In the 1960s, the sculptor Robert Adams made an extensive series of works experimenting with the screen as a form. In this freestanding maquette, strong vertical lines are broken up with welded clusters of short steel rods. Designed to be seen from both sides, against a well-lit plain white background, the spaces between the rods become active elements of the composition.

Adams wanted to achieve a sense of controlled movement in his work, stating in 1966 that:

'I am [...] interested in contrasts between linear forces and masses, between solid and open areas [...] the aim is stability and movement in one form'. [1]
